TAMARA CODOR, FLOOR 13

< shore thing

Stationed along the west shoreline of Bainbridge Island, the featured home was designed to maximize its Olympic Mountain panoramas and entertain a natural correspondence between the interior and exterior spaces. “Given the dynamic charge behind the sustainable movement, there are so many opportunities to integrate conservational elements in residential design,” says architect Matthew Coates. Orienting the layout to enjoy abundant natural light, Coates also implemented a framework of responsibly harvested lumber, a hydronic radiant heating system and a passive solar design component to round out the home’s impressive register of eco-conscious features. ## ^ FLOOR SHOW

For owner Tamara Codor, amplifying the diversity of Floor 13’s eclectic mixture of sustainable wares is a daily endeavor. Many of the elements that comprise the tony Pioneer Square space, such as the tree stump coffee table shown above, “were objects I found discarded or at local resale shops,” says Codor, who also operates an eponymous interior design firm. “When combined with the appropriate finishes and decorative elements, repurposed furnishings exude such a unique allure.” Host to an ever-evolving assemblage of exclusive designs, the gallery-like setting also exhibits the artwork of local talent on a rotational basis. ## MATERIAL MINDED >

Established on the utilization of discarded materials that remained from mass furniture production in Indonesia, Selamat Designs continues to fabricate sustainable furnishings that are made to last. The Soren sideboard, shown here in teak with a gray finish, pairs classic mitered joinery with midcentury-style boomerang legs and is just one component of the San Francisco company’s latest collection. Other pieces include a complementary dining set, lounge chair and occasional tables—both coffee and side—that are also available in white. selamatdesigns.com
